

The man who fell asleep's Tube line poll 2010

Introduction: The “favourite” tube line poll was very exciting. Well, as exciting as any other vaguely pointless distraction from my continued nervous breakdown. I had to make constant reminder that the DLR and the East London Line are not tube lines. Fair enough, the East London Line used to be part of the tube system but it's now operated by London Overground. The DLR? Pshaw. It's a lovely little rollercoaster ride, but it's most certainly not a tube line. Yokels, eh?

When the results started coming in, I was surprised by what I saw. As someone who grew up in north east London, I had assumed that everyone else shared my belief that the Piccadilly, Victoria and Northern Lines were automatically superior to others. I view the Bakerloo and Jubilee Lines as amusing distractions, but hardly serious contenders. It seems many of you disagree. I am faintly disgusted.

Results:

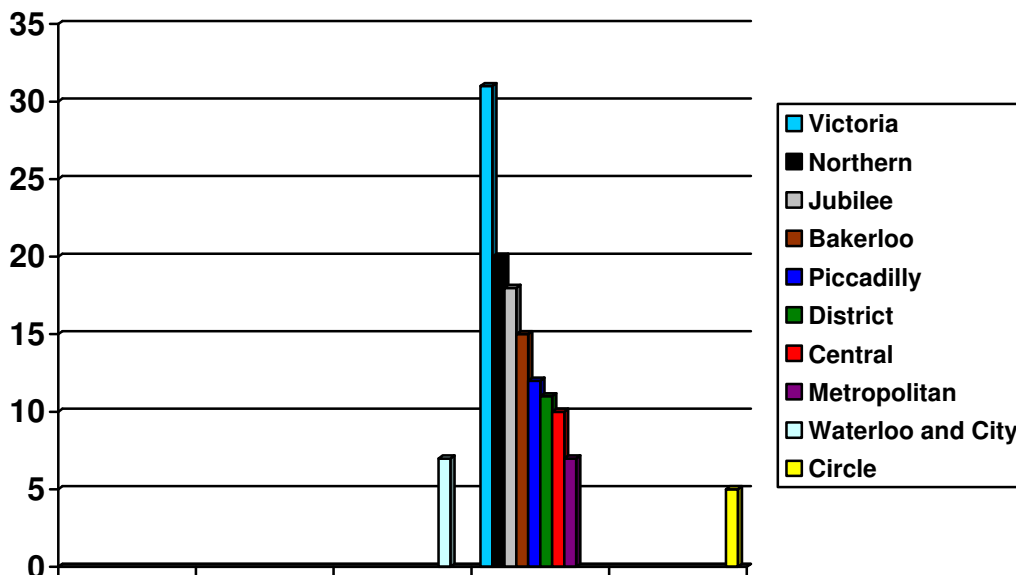

In first place, with a colossal 31 votes was the Victoria line.

In 2nd place with 20 votes was the Northern line.

In 3rd place with 18 votes was the Jubilee line

The full results are:

Victoria:	31
Northern:	20
Jubilee:	18
Bakerloo:	15
Piccadilly:	12
District:	11
Central:	10
Metropolitan:	7
Waterloo and City:	7
Circle:	5

Postscript: Now, I know what you're thinking: There's a tube line missing. Indeed. The poor old Hammersmith and City line received no votes at all. Even the Waterloo and City line, which consists of only two stations, received 7 votes. And it wasn't as if people were tweeting me to say how much they hated the Hammersmith and City line. It merely slipped out of the public consciousness.